

Nutritional rickets remains a global public health concern, particularly in a number of lower–middle income countries (LMIC) and among at–risk immigrant communities in resource rich countries, as has been highlighted by a recent international consensus statement (Munns et al., 2016), despite a greater understanding of the etiology and pathogenesis of the condition.