

Analytical and pharmaceutical chemistry are two closely related fields that play a vital role in modern science and medicine. It uses a variety of techniques, such as titration, spectrophotometry, and chromatography to measure the concentration of substances in a sample. Analytical chemistry is the science of identifying and quantifying the components of matter.