

Sonnet 138 presents a candid psychological study of the mistress that reveals many of her hypocrisies. Cynically, he too deceives and is comforted by knowing that he is no longer fooled by the woman's charade of fidelity to him, nor she by how young and simpleminded he presents himself to be. In a relationship without affection or trust, the two lovers agree to a relationship based on mutual deception.