

4. The 14th Amendment Many members of the United States Congress believed that President Johnson was treating the defeated white southerners too kindly and the southerners were taking advantage of this by cheating the blacks. In July 1866, despite opposition from the President, Congress passed a Civil Rights Act and then introduced the 14th Amendment to the Constitution that gave blacks full rights of citizenship, including the right to vote.