

This view was expanded by students of Gibson (Lee & Young, 1986; Reed, 1982) and became known as the ecological approach to motor control. It suggests that motor control evolved so that animals could cope with the environment around them, moving in it effectively in order to find food, run away from predators, build shelter, and even play (Reed, 1982).