

initial fact-finding session between an occupational therapy practitioner and a patient. This helps in understanding how the patient perceives themselves in various roles at home, work, school, and during leisure activities. The primary purpose of this interview is to determine the patient's problems, discuss possible interventions, and develop a treatment plan¹.