

INTRODUCTION The characterization of modern societies as 'information societies' Success and failure of individual and collective actors alike depend increasingly on their ability to accumulate and distribute information. Rather, it needs systematic planning in order to reach its goals. 'Output'?