This project addresses the inflexibility of traditional cooling systems by designing an auto-control system using a microcontroller (Arduino programmed in C++). The system automatically adjusts coolant temperature (ON/OFF) based on conditions, verified using a thermo-humidity controller. DC fans replace air conditioners for cost-effectiveness. The system uses 12V and 5V DC power supplies and incorporates a magnetic card security gate for safety.