

The COVID-19 pandemic dramatically altered social media's role, boosting usage as people sought online connection, information, and entertainment. Content diversified beyond influencers, incorporating personal narratives. E-commerce thrived, mental health discussions increased, and political debate intensified, alongside misinformation. New online communities and activism emerged, ultimately highlighting social media's critical function for work, communication, and self-expression.