The French exploration of North America, primarily focused on Canada and areas along the Mississippi River, was driven by a quest for wealth rather than a desire to settle permanently.This explains why their settlements were not permanent, as they did not seek to establish lasting communities but rather to exploit the resources they found and return home.

Summarized by © lakhasly.com