

A common technique for growing single crystal silicon involves the selective cooling of molten polycrystalline silicon<sup>2</sup> so that solidification occurs in a particular crystal direction (Czochralski method). Typical starting material in a semiconductor fabrication process is a silicon wafer, which we call now as a substrate. Crystal growth ?