

In May 1775, the American Continental Congress met in Philadelphia and began to act as an American national government. It set up an army under the command of George Washington; a Virginia landowner and experienced military leader. The Continental Congress also sent representatives to seek help from European countries, mainly France; Britain's old enemy. Two days later, the Declaration of Independence was issued.