

Cleanup measures can directly remove the excess nutrients such as nitrogen and phosphorus from the water. Biological processes employ microorganisms that consume nutrients as part of their metabolic processes, effectively reducing nutrient levels. Chemical treatments use coagulants and flocculants to bind nutrients, making them easier to remove.