

There are many reasons for doing things, but most motivation belongs to one of four main categories. There are rewards, such as a good mark on an essay or a cash bonus at work, and there are fears, such as losing your job or having a car accident. Then there is the motivation of achievement, for example, feeling proud of finishing a long and difficult book. Finally we can be motivated by social pressure, like getting married because society expects us to.