

In a democratic setting, by contrast, resolving conflict is complicated and generally takes a good deal of time. Our argument is probabilistic: old democracies are more likely than new democracies and authoritarian regimes to have strong institutions